Editorial Opinion

ZIONIST LEADERSHIP

Below I refer to the possible candidates who are likely to be put forward for the position of Leader of the Zionist movement at the forthcoming Congress. When analysed, the list, it must be confessed — and for my part with regret — does not offer any very striking alternative to asking Dr. Weizmann to resume the post if he has really retired from it, or to continue in it if he has not. I say that this is a matter for regret, because I am sure the movement needs a new man at its head, and because as Leader Dr. Weizmann has failed egregiously in many important respects. Moreover, he has recently given support to ideas concerning the future of Palestine which, to say no more, are distinctly anti-Zionist and which, no circumstances, however difficult and complicated, can be held to excuse.

But that is not the worst so far as Dr. Weizmann's appointment as Leader goes. If he is elected, he will be, as I have pointed out, unless rigidly restrained, in the position of Dictator such as the "only possible" person in a like position almost invariably becomes. But in his case there would be a considerable difference, because I doubt if he has the strength of character to become a Dictator par ce simple. He would really find himself dictated to; first by the British Government and then by the Arabs, so that the Jewish future of the country would be in those hands. The one is utterly indifferent to the formation of a National Home for the Jewish People, while the other is bitterly opposed to the idea! And in the movement itself these sentiments are also represented; and Dr. Weizmann, more than anyone else, is responsible for giving them the opportunity for influencing the whole position of Zionism.

There is, I believe, but one way out. It is for Congress to make some provision whereby it will re-assert its control of the movement, and make it clear to anyone who may be appointed Leader that it will take care to have the policy it decides upon carried out — that is to say to adopt means for preventing a Dictatorship. But then, that it can hardly do until it rids itself of the non-Zionist element represented by the "mixed Agency."

ZIONIST PRINCIPLES

Professor Brodetsky at a meeting of the Zionist Federation last week, laid down what he termed four "fundamental principles" of Zionism, and assuming he was correctly reported it is to be hoped that such real nonsense as he talked will be subjected to at least a modicum of common sense by those his words may reach, and then severely set as a curiosity of Professional oratory. The first principle he said was:—

That the building up of the Jewish National Home was something which ultimately did not depend upon the will or consent of any other agent but the Jewish people. The decisive factor in the success of their policy would, and must, be the will and the energy of the Jewish people itself.

But if this be so why bother about anything else, such as the British Government or the Arabs? Yet Dr. Brodetsky proceeds to declare that his second principle must be "partnership with the Mandatory Power"; and this ignores the fact that Zionism became a factor in Jewish economy only when such an instrument as a Mandatory Power was thought of.

Then we are told that the third fundamental principle of Zionism is "an understanding with the Arabs." As such an understanding, however, inevitably is necessarily dependent on the Arabs, it must come as against Professor Brodetsky's two other principles, but places Zionism at the mercy of Arab interests instead of being a vindication of Jewish human rights. As the fourth principle, Dr. Brodetsky would have the Congress announce a Zionist policy. So would I, but I do not see how that is to be attained with the "mixed" Jewish Agency composed as largely as it is of those who are anti-Jewish Nationalists, placed in the position of being able to dictate to the extent they can and uses the policy of the Movement. I am sorry to note that Professor Brodetsky was answered, to some distress at the meeting, by one because the best answer to the principles on which he was responsible would have been obtained by giving a patient and reasonable hearing to what he said. London Jewish Chronicle.

TO THOSE of you who are having three meals each day and who have a home, we make this appeal on behalf of the thousands who have no food or a roof to cover their heads except through Federation.

THE HUNGRY must be fed and the suffering cared for and it is to you who are not on the charity list to offer help to your fellow Jews.

IF YOU are lamenting the fact that this year has been a poor one for you and that it is impossible for you to fulfil your pledge, just think how fortunate you are and of the circumstances of those who are compelled to seek aid through the agencies of Federation. It is your bound duty to share your crust with those less fortunate than yourself.

ON THEIR behalf we make this appeal to you to send in your cheque to Federation so that your co-religionists will be given a chance to survive the horrible conditions due to the present unemployment situation and world-wide economic depression. A crisis faces Federation. It behooves all those who have pledged and thereby authorized Federation to make appropriations to the Constituent Societies, to fulfil their pledge and to fulfil it now.

RABBI'S MARRIAGE ORDERED ANNULLED

On the ground that the bride was insane at the time of her marriage and because that fact was concealed from her intended husband Mr. Justice William Patterson of the Superior Court, Friday, June 19 annulled the marriage of the Rev. Elias Flaxman, Montreal rabbi, and Rachel Kusdan, now a patient in the Verdun Protestant Hospital. Two children, issue of the marriage, are also in the Verdun hospital.

Dr. Norman Viner, specialist in mental diseases attached to the Verdun Protestant Hospital, testified that he had first examined the patient 25 years ago and that she suffered then, and was still suffering, from dementia praecox, an incurable form of insanity. The doctor gave it as his opinion, after examining all the evidence, that the woman had been insane before her marriage.

Flaxman's action was directed against the superintendent of the Verdun Protestant Hospital in his quality of curator to the patient. The judgment rendered by Mr. Justice Patterson provides for civil rights for the children.

Flaxman's marriage was one of those common in the Old World and not unheard of in European communities here that was arranged by the parents and a marriage broker.

Flaxman had known his bride-to-be only a few hours when the ceremony was performed, and from the time he met her until after the ceremony her face was heavily veiled, he told the court. He, therefore, had no means of knowing that she was insane.

Thirty years ago both families lived in Brest Litovsk, Russia, a town since made famous by the fact that the treaty which took Russia out of the Great War was signed there with Germany. At that time Flaxman, who was 18 years of age, was studying for the rabbinate. His parents arranged the marriage through a marriage broker, and one of the premarital arrangements was that the prospective father-in-law would bear the expense of the remainder of the youth's education.

When the marriage was about to take place, Flaxman declared, the bride was brought to his part of the town and in the evening the ceremony took place. Until it was over he did not see her face.

It was only later, he contended, that he discovered his bride was insane. In 1907 he came to Canada and she followed him a year later. In 1913 her condition became such that it was necessary to confine her to a hospital for the insane, where two of her children followed her.

Flaxman asked that the marriage be annulled because his wife's condition was concealed from him prior to the marriage.

every Friday

Some time ago a Chicago Jew was sentenced by a judge to serve six months in jail for contempt of court because he refused to accept a rabbinical divorce from his wife. Since then on the ground that it is unconstitutional for a civil court to force a man to accept a religious divorce, a Superior Court judge has struck out from the civil divorce decree the ruling that the husband must consent to a Jewish divorce from his wife. Now the wife is appealing from the decision of the Superior Court judge and here's hoping she wins. If the woman wins she is free of a pig or rather, perhaps, a dog in the manger, forever. If she loses she can never marry again and still remain in her own opinion a "good Orthodox Jewish woman," as evidently she is.

According to Orthodox Jewish law a wife cannot divorce her husband. The husband must give his consent if the wife wants a divorce. But the man may divorce his wife. In olden days if a man refused to consent to a divorce the rabbi could excommunicate him. In modern times, so-called, a rabbi who did such a thing might face a suit for damages. The only recourse a wife has in a case where the husband refuses consent to a divorce is moral suasion; in other words, talk. Apparently this cannot be depended upon and even if it could be the position of the Orthodox Jewish woman with regard to divorce is ignominious.

The position of the Orthodox Jewish woman is still ignominious in a day when the trend of modern thought is toward easier divorce and divorce that will act quickly in terminating a partnership which at least one human being and sometimes two human beings do not desire. This is an age when women are emancipated or think they are emancipated or want to be. At any rate the marriage partnership can no longer be regarded as one in which the man the figure and the woman the cipher. Even among Jews who worship and spoil their sons so dreadfully it is beginning to be considered barbarous for the woman's side of the marriage bargain not to be taken into account and for only the man's susceptibilities and emotions to be considered.

In the face of this change in feeling, Orthodox Jewish laws remain as they were. The recent annual convention of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada held at Belmar, New Jersey, indulged in a lengthy discussion on the spiritual and religious status of contemporary American Orthodoxy. Press reports said that "an air of pessimism pervaded the convention hall and tense faces and tearful eyes were visible when speakers deplored the spiritual poverty of American Jewry. This lack of spiritual consciousness they declared was provoking a spiritual crisis. Unless material help for yeshivahs is forthcoming disintegration threatens Orthodoxy here and abroad."

Disintegration threatens Orthodoxy here anyway. The very champions and guardians of Orthodoxy betray it by hypocrisy and by living lives which give them away as being untouched by any true religion. Whether yeshivahs do or do not need help or whether they do or do not receive it has little to do with the case one way or the other. One of the real troubles is that the leaders of Orthodoxy, the rabbis, sat tight and unheeding while the rest of progress made a wide detour away from them. If an air of pessimism pervaded the convention hall it was too mild an air. Despair would have fitted the occasion better since what the Orthodox rabbis were facing was the death of Orthodoxy after a lingering illness which they as doctors failed to diagnose properly or in time. One of the sights which in days to come will be sought and failed to grasp the import of is such a case as that of a Jewish woman who cannot receive a divorce because her husband will not give his consent and Orthodox Jewish law is Orthodox Jewish law, amen.

The story may be over perhaps for a new Orthodoxy of some sort or in revision and modification of Jewish laws in an effort to apply them to these present and these times. One man who believes this is Rabbi Julius Berger, rabbi of Shaare Zion Synagogue, Montreal. He is insistent upon the reorganizing of a Sanhedrin for the purpose of modernizing Orthodox Jewish law. He should have the support of all Canadian Jews of progressive views who are dissatisfied with whatever is primitive and ridiculous in Jewish law and who are anxious for improvement and revitalization through change and common sense.

ASSOCIATION AND ADMINISTRATOR VINDICATED

Dismissing Wolf Horn's two actions for $124,150 each, against the Jewish Colonization Association and Simon Belkin, its administrator in Canada, Mr. Justice Campbell Lane, of the Superior Court, on Saturday June 20; condemned Horn as being tricky and dishonest, declared that Horn and two other witnesses had given perjured testimony, and that Horn was trying to "squeeze" the association into a settlement of his claim. Horn, ousted from his farm in the colony of Sonnenfeld, Saskatchewan, sued on the ground that he had been led by fraud to sign a seven-months crop lease to his farm instead of a three years lease he claims was promised to him.

The trial of Horn's actions, which were joined for hearing, ranked second only to the Davis-Shaughnessy action for length last year. A whole term was given over to it.

Horn, a Polish Jew, had been a farmer in Poland and in 1927 decided to come to Canada with his wife and four children to farm in the west. He obtained a letter of introduction from the agent of the Jewish Colonization Association at Warsaw to the society in Canada but had made up his mind to take up a farm offered by the Canadian National Railway Colonization Department. To this end he made a deposit of $400 with the Canadian National. When he arrived at Winnipeg, however, he was induced by agents of the association to settle in one of the colonies settled by the association, where he would be among people of his own faith, language and customs.

Under the direction of Simon Belkin, administrator for the association, Horn was settled on a farm of 320 acres, with a seven-room house and farm buildings, at Hoffer, in the colony of Sonnenfeld.

Horn claimed in his actions that on the day of his arrival at Hoffer, June 11 1927, he entered into a verbal agreement with one Ellman, former administrator of the association, in the presence of Israel Hoffer, a Justice of the Peace, for a three-year lease of the farm with an option of purchase at the end of three years for $15 an acre. It was his contention however, that later, through fraud and duress on the part of Belkin, he was led to sign a seven-months lease in the belief that it was a three-years lease. Later, when the association contended that he had not fulfilled the conditions of his lease, he was ousted from the farm. He brought action on the ground that Belkin, and one Barish, as agents of the association had entered into a malicious conspiracy to oust him from his land, and he asked the court to ratify the alleged agreement whereby he was to have been given a three-years lease with an option to purchase.

Horn's contension, His Lordship pointed out, was that he had incurred the ill-will and spite of Belkin and that it was because of this ill-will that Belkin prepared a seven-months' crop lease instead of the three-years' lease, and sent Barish to Hoffer to secure Horn's signature to it the whole with a view to getting Horn off the farm and thus preventing him from exercising his alleged option to purchase.

The event to which Horn attributed Belkin's animus was reviewed by His Lordship. A batch of new colonists had just arrived from Europe and Belkin had gone to Winnipeg to meet them and conduct them to the Sonnenfeld colony. Horn went to Estevan to meet them obviously as His Lordship debated to welcome them and greet them on their arrival in their adopted country.

His manner of welcoming them, Mr. Justice Lane declared, was to deliver a harangue in the course of which he did his utmost to discourage them, to promote distrust and ill-will against the association. He told the colonists they would starve and be frozen to death and be very badly treated by the association.

This story by narrated by Rabbi Berger, who had spent many years in the colony and was so scandalized by Horn's conduct that he intervened to stop him.

The colonists spent the night at Estevan and the next morning on the station platform, before the train started for Tribune, Rabbi Berger heard Horn attacking Belkin in front of the colonists. Horn, His Lordship declared, tried to prevent the colonists from following the instructions of the administrator and wanted to take them apart until he and they should decide what would be the best thing for them to do.

It was time, His Lordship commented, that the colonists had shown some discontent on their journey west from Winnipeg, but Horn's unjustifiable and incendiary interference and attitude had added to the discontent and had had such an effect on the newly-arrived colonists that for a time they even refused to take shelter from inclement weather.

Belkin took Horn to task. It was not long before this. His Lordship noted, that those already in the colony, Horn among them, had signed a memorandum praising the association for all it had done for them. What could have induced Horn's change of attitude would have been hard to explain had it not been for Horn's character, his wrath at the slowness of—the association in rebuilding his buildings and Belkin's refusal to lend him $10 in Regina, His Lordship added. For this Horn was reported to have said he would get even with Belkin. It was proved that when Horn spoke to Hoffer at the station in Tribune, he said: "I fixed Belkin all right." "There is no doubt of Horn's animosity and bitter hatred of Belkin," His Lordship added. "It is proved he had threatened to kill Belkin, and from what he says in his testimony one might think he may have regretted he did not do so."

After the extraordinary conduct of Horn upon the arrival of the new colonists, His Lordship continued, Belkin was not inclined to tolerate him as a colonist. He had shown himself to be a man addicted to harsh language, of a quarrelsome character, and with an ungovernable temper. "That he was at heart an agitator is shown by his admission that he was convicted of conspiracy to forge money in his own country in a political matter, that his sentence was appealed from but confirmed, and that he was apparently a fugitive from justice when he came to Canada. He had also been convicted of assault for throwing an officer of the law downstairs in his native Poland, who came to arrest a Jewish rabbi. He evident he sought power and prominence and had set himself in open defiance to the administration and its relations with the new colonists."

The case hinged partly on establishing what arrangements had been made by Horn with the association's agents. "One of the features confronting the court is that the testimony of Horn is entirely unreliable," His Lordship declared on this point. "It is contradicted by reliable witnesses. He has contradicted himself quite frequently and besides his contradictions by himself, the proof shows him to be tricky and dishonest." The evidence of Israel Hoffer, on the other hand, the court thought honest and trustworthy. "Ellman (former administrator of the colony) with his would-be glib smartness is not impressive," His Lordship added. "Like Horn, he suffers from a magnified impression of his importance, and from vanity, but unlike Horn he has not an interest in the event of he suit and his testimony is preferble to that of a party to the suit." Ullman's evidence, moreover, agreed n many details with that of Hoffer, vhom His Lordship believed to be worthy of belief.

After discussing the evidence reting to Horn's claim that he had een promised a three-year lease ith an option to purchase, His Lordship pointed out that the relationship of the association with its colonists was special and not entirely like that of lessor and lessee. It was founding a colony, it was not making money out of the colonists. The success of the colony would depend on their character and conduct and the association was therefore interested before finally establishing a colonist on a farm by deed, in knowing that he would not be an agitator, firebrand and mischief maker, or an element of disturbance to the colony as a whole. It was to guard against this contingency that their colonists were taken on probation, as well as to test their agricultural possibilities.

The contention that it was sheer personal pique, or enmity or hatred, which induced Belkin to grant only a seven-months' lease did not appear to be true, His Lordship continued. The court also held that Horn was fully aware of the duration of the impugned lease.

Much evidence was offered as to what occurred when Horn signed this lease in Israel Hoffer's house. Apart from those in the room, whose testimony was contradictory, the only other witness was a colonist named Biller, who claimed he had listened in on the negotiations from an adjoining room. "A straightforward man would have entered the room where the deed was being signed," His Lordship commented, "and would not have lain in ambush like a spy. Where the invisible witness is brought into play suspicion is aroused. The honourable man does not take the role of eavesdropper, especially where he becomes one by design, as in this case. The court has come to the conclusion that Horn and these two ex-colonists (another colonist listened in) are attempting to 'put up a plant' and that their testimony is perjured."

Later, after discussing evidence which led the court to believe that Horn was tricky and dishonest, His Lordship declared that the damages claimed were grossly and scandalously exaggerated. He also referred to Horn's resort to the criminal law in Saskatchewan during the pendancy of the civil action. These two, His Lordship declared, "would lead to the belief that Horn was attempting to 'squeeze' the Jewish Colonization Association) into a settlement."

Horn had not established his demand, in Mr. Justice Lane's view, and the action was accordingly dismissed, with costs.

Horn was represented by Henry T. Silverstone, with R. L. Calder, K.C., as counsel; the association was represented by Lazarus Phillips, K.C., of Phillips and Spether, with Aime Geoffrion, K.C., as counsel.

to the beginning or he simply would not play at all.

"You little silly," Ann humorously mocked him. "That's not the way to tell a story."

"Here!" She insisted, rolling his face to a bellicose pipe.

"All right." She gave in with a tired sigh.

"This doggie and this doggie and this doggie," He held each and, gravely scratching the faces of the kittens with a tiny finger nail, attempted to take off their glossy pink complexions.

"That'll be such a goose, dear." Ann laughed. "They're not doggies. They're kittens."

She jumped, ducked his head from under his mother's chin, turned and surveyed her in a hurt dudgeon.

"No more nonsense, young man," she rebuked him. "What are the kitties saying to each other, Sir?"

Without a word, he sledded off her lap and landed with a bump on the floor.

"Why, Sir," Ann protested. "You know, when mother says they're kitties, they are kitties." Leaning down, she lifted him to his feet.

He pushed her off. Tears sparkled in his unfathomable eyes. She had committed the unpardonable sin; she had flatly contradicted him. He would have no more to do with her.

Picking his picture book under his arm, he trotted over to George. "Doggies" he appealed in plaintive accents.

"Of course they're doggies," George sympathetically patted his curls. "Come on in here." He opened his legs wide and Sir advanced between them, as if through a triumphal arch. "Don't you mind her, Sir." He kissed a single malicious glance at Ann. "She's an old cross-patch, your mother is." He pressed the child's body between his legs in a grip of paternal tenderness. Sir smiled up at him with regnish cordiality, opened his book to the first page and handed it to him.

"This doggie and this doggie and this doggie," he continued his interrupted narrative.

"And what did they say?" George urged.

Sir wasn't quite sure. George whispered something into his left ear.

Sir roared and wagged a delighted head. "Doggie said —" and the direct quotation sounded surprisingly like "Mama an ugly old thing."

Ann got up. "I don't think it's at least bit funny your teaching him to be disobedient and childish." She spoke with a fagged bitterness. "The only reason you humor him is because you want to tease me."

"Really?" He grinned at her a grimace that stretched his mouth taut, like a lumberjack's.

"It's an unfair I can't manage him when he can be as bad as he pleases and you'll back him up." She drew her shoulders together. She looked, at that moment, bloodless and ill and strained. "I suppose I am cross but how can I, under the sun can I be anything else?"

"You've had your own way too long — that's the trouble with you," he grumbled. "You've interfered and minded everybody's business — and now you don't like it, you're jealous, when Sir shows he's got some use for me." He threw a protecting arm over the boy's shoulder and hugged him more tightly between his legs.

"It's all wrong, George — cowardly to act like that." She was sharp. "Naturally he turns to you — he knows that you're working against me, that you'll encourage him in what ever he does."

"I won't stand by and see him browbeaten till he hasn't got a [illegible] can call his own — that's certain." George defied her. "I'm sick of your methods, Ann."

"At least I'm working for Sir's good," she harshly reminded him.

"Oh, Lord!" he scoffed. "Is that what you call it when you [illegible] every bit of me out of him?"

"I want him to grow up with a little chance to be happy — that's the main point." A log broke in the fireplace and all at once her face was fiercely illuminated — a grim wistful

FRATERNAL SOFTBALL

Only two games were played in the Jewish Fraternal Softball League last week, the late game on Tuesday night being called off in honor of the marriage of the manager Jack Romuck. Friday night the second contest was postponed on account of rain. In the fixture on Tuesday night Pride of Israel outlasted the Rokeahs by the close score of 8 to 7, scoring two runs in the last inning and holding the Jewish Druggists to one run. Moe Shadlin, newly-signed player of the Prides, knocked out two home runs, the first time this was done, while "Red" Dobkin had three hits. George Goldman the manager also hit well. Grossman was the best hitter for the Rokeahs. "Red" Bocknack and Pehenick were the pick of the fielders for Rokeahs with Goldman starring for the winners. Friday night Judeans met Knights of Pythias with the leadership at stake, both having been undefeated. Judeans got away to a good start scoring six runs in the first inning before the Knights settled down, but the teams played even ball after that inning. The rain fell heavily in the fifth and sixth innings. Sammy Gold stopping play. Mark Kosky and Sammy Feldt led the hitters for the winners who have now won five straight. Miller having three of the wins to his credit with Ben Robinson having the other two. "Kounal" Oelbaum and Max Cohen were the best hitters for the Pythians with the former including a home run. On the coming Tuesday night Grand Order of Israel play the Rokeahs, with Foresters meeting Pythians in the late game. Grand Order and K. of P. must win to keep up with Judeans. On Friday night the Boni Brith play Judeans; Y. M. H. A. the Pride of Israel.

Here's a pleasant way to drink milk

Doctors tell you that milk should be an important part of the daily diet, especially for children. But milk is not particularly appetizing to many people, and the result is that these people avoid drinking milk and thus are deprived of its benefits.

But here's a way to make milk appetizing for everyone — young and old alike — just mix a spoonful or two of Vi-Tone into a cup or glass of milk — and the result is a delightfully flavored beverage.

Because of Vi-Tone's high-vitamine Soya Bean content, when added to milk it increases its nourishment value many times and imparts a flavor all its own.

Buy a tin of Vi-Tone at your Grocer's or Druggist's, or try Vi-Tone at the Soda Fountain.

Among Toronto Jewish Women

Mrs. M. Zahler, 884 Avenue Road, says: "One of the finest women of my acquaintance is Mrs. A. B. Bennett, of 18 Claxton Boulevard. To the majority of people she is known as an ardent Zionist worker—vice-president of Toronto Hadassah, a member of the National Executive, and chairman of the Educational and Propaganda Committee for the Central Division. But to me she is first of all the personification of friendliness, goodness, sincerity and capability. Here is a different sort of capability from the average person's. It is not marked with that air of hustle bustle and intolerance generally characteristic of efficient women. Notwithstanding this she gets as good results with her methods of handling affairs and people as the most terrifying efficient ones. And any one who has had the pleasure of working with her knows this."

little face with prominent cheek-bones and a set jaw; but into her eyes there had come a distressed pleading tenderness. "I can't let that baby be spoiled, George. He'd end by being everybody's enemy — even his own."

Nic's eyes traveled in gleeful pride from Ann to George. He relished discord — particularly when he could feel himself responsible.

"You think, because we don't get along, I'm entirely to blame," George burst out. "You make me so devilish tired, with your everlasting airs. You're going to teach Nic to look down on me — and then he'll be all right, then he'll be a real comfort to you."

Huddled over the boy, he stared up at Ann from under his stormy eyebrows. "If I smash everything to pieces some day, it'll serve you good and right — and don't you forget it."

"See here, George," she confronted him, "do you intend to keep on putting him against me?"

"Of course I do." He was obdurate. "I'm his father; I mean to bring him up as I think best."

"I never believed, till now, that you'd deliberately try to spoil him," she said with incredulous scorn. "You can't love him. You can't care what happens to him. You're using him — using him to hurt me — that's all."

"You'd better take that back." Still clinging to Nic, he held her with a fixed magnetic glare. She had told the truth; and, like a man who has been discovered in an unnatural crime, he was half cowed and half savage.

"I won't have you bringing Nic into it — that's final." Ann's voice was brittle and shrill. "If you want to fight me, you'll have to find some other way."

She stood over him, opposing the strength of her clear indomitable purpose to the weakness of his groping confusion. His eyes, a swimming blackness sunk deep in their gaunt sockets, went of a sudden dead-weary and sightless.

"Shut up, then, for God's sake, and leave me alone," he cried out of his beaten despair. "And take your damned kid with you — I don't want him."

"But my doggies?" Nic wailed, while he was being pushed out peremptorily from between the ramparts of his father's knees.

"She says they're kittens." George jerked a disgusted thumb at Ann. "So I guess you'd better let it go at that, my boy."

But Nic had no intention of letting it go at that. Caught up into Ann's arms, he was borne away reiterating his contention that they were doggies and shrieking his denunciation of Ann as an "ugly old thing."

Left to himself, George drew up his legs under his chin, turned over on his side and, resting one cheek against the upholstered back of the chair, sat for a long time in a crouched dejection. He felt heavy and sick. The few fretful gestures he made were those of a man tossing in a dry fever on a tired bed, pressing his face into the pillow for solace and coolness. His head ached and yet was numb. More and more, in the past few months, he had had the sensation that, while his brain worked at a dizzy speed, the bones of his skull kept tightening around it, binding it down in a dull vise. The churned turmoil of his thoughts had seemed to beat against a substance hard as stone. The throb of his mind had come to have the hollow thud of a pulse upon dead eardrums. "My head's queer," he would muse in panicky consternation. "Something's the matter with my head, damn it." Unhappiness was with him an actual physical disease: it riled the juices of his body, bruised his nerves and clogged his blood. After a quarrel with Ann, he always lapsed into a deafened lethargy. That she possessed a subtle advantage over him he somehow knew. In their conflict, she was being tempered and made more delicately pliable; her reason was sharpening itself to thin steel. Every day, she showed a keener skill, a shrewder contempt. In quick cold flashes, she could cut through his clumsy defenses. He longed to wound her flesh in bitter reprisal and make it wince; but under his persecution, she was turning from a vulnerable woman to a bodiless scorn. Wretchedness purged of fever he could not comprehend. Ann was to him the merciless diplomat. The frequent threat that some day he'd "smash everything" brought him his only real comfort. It was a diabolical reminder that he could still escape the humiliation of utter defeat; in the end, he could summon his failing resources to precipitate the ruin that was his unalienable birth-right. She'd never get away from him — never!

Burrowing with his nose into the cushions of the chair, he swore persistently and half-heartedly. Then he rolled over with a weary grunt, slumped down on the middle of his spine and yawned. As he flung his arms up over his head and stretched his cramped legs, a faint wash of warmth sluiced through his veins. His misery, that made the very marrow of his bones ache, gave him also an acute sexual sensitiveness. His anger against Ann usually ended in a flustered passion. With that sensual irritant curdling in his loins, he was still at her mercy, a sick man pleading to be bled of his torment.

"Ann — what are you doing?" he shouted out crossly.

"I'll be there in a minute," she called back from the nursery.

"Now remember, Hulda," she had been cautioning Nic's nurse. "Just a little marmalade for his supper." Nic, on Hulda's knee with his picture-book open before him, was recounting the amazing exploits of the three kittens. Every minute or so, he would steal a suspicious glance at the Swedish woman. If she should have the impudence to call these particular quadrupeds "doggies," she'd be sorry for it — that was his attitude at present. His mother, in ten short minutes, had thoroughly convinced him of his mistake. Now he would champion her theories to the death. Unlike his father, he could stammer out the sweetest of apologies when there was no other plausible issue from a dilemma. Ann kissed him and received a dutiful hug. Patting his curls, she shook her head in a sudden illogical discouragement. Somehow, she resented the child's gracious docility. She saw him as a traitor to his father and she could not quite forgive him. It was all her own doing, of course. In the preposterous argument about the three kittens, she had forced Nic over to her side; but she hated to think that the man had been shamelessly deserted by the boy. In everything that concerned George, she still felt the fierce protective instinct of the mother. She herself must be stern with him; but no one else had the right to hurt him. After a crisis like to-day's, her keen vision often clouded: having disciplined Nic into obedience, she would grow sorrowful, pitying George, regarding his tiny foe with distressed annoyance, half wishing she had given in this once — just this once.

"Time for tea, George?" she asked quietly as she came into the drawing-room.

He did not answer. Sprawled in his chair, he frowned at his legs.

She sat down near the window and, taking from her work-basket a half-finished sweater of Nic's, began to knit. The needles clicked comfortably in the silence.

At last, "Tea," George scoffed. "Tea!"

She smiled, counting stitches. "What's wrong with tea?" she wanted to know.

"Oh, the devil, what's wrong with everything!" he countered sadly. He got to his feet, crossed the room and threw himself down in disconsolate surrender on the arm of her chair. Suddenly, the need to touch her had become irresistible; he had let it sweep his pride under. "Ann," he heard his voice supplicating her with stupid shaky fervor. "Look here, Ann — it's all rot — it's all such damned nonsense." He had slipped an arm around her neck and, holding her chin in his hand, was forcing her head back. "Come on, Ann — will you? Please!" he blundered ahead, clumsy and rough even in this moment of his bitter desire. He began to grumble out fatuous endearments — the caressing indecent nonsense that he had used long ago, to Molly Banks. He had pulled her face close to his. Involuntarily, her mouth thinned to a mere line of scorn. There had been too many reconciliations of late that had brought only their flesh together and left them the more wretchedly estranged. The old robust health of their relation had broken; their enmity was fomented to a burning anguish by the heat of their joined bodies.

In greedy tenderness, he had kissed her on the mouth. For an instant she was frightened and trembled under him. Then he felt her go rigid; and the swift unexpected strength of her recoil struck upon him like an arrow shot through his chest.

He sprang to his feet in a fuming rage and flung her down into the chair. Dimly, through his driving confusion, he made out his own figure in its contemptible plight of a moment ago: he had been groveling before her, acting the beastly fool. He had given up his whole being to her on a spendthrift impulse. That he should have committed the extravagant folly bewildered him; but that Ann should have stiffened against him and mercilessly thrown him off — that smarting humiliation was beyond his endurance.

A motionless huddled heap, she stared up at him. There was a streak of moisture across her face — for all this thick daze, he noticed it: his mouth, when he kissed her, had left that wet mark on her left cheek. Unconsciously she rubbed the palm of her hand over the place; to George, the random gesture seemed a definite insult — as if she were wiping away the trailed slime of a snake. The blood surged into his head and rolled like a sweat over his eyeballs. He took a single stride forward and crouched in front of her, his hands, on the arms of her chair, keeping her a prisoner. Without stirring, she looked at him in a strained quiet, expressionless but unconquerably resolute. Her terror had given way; she was all at once remote, beyond his influence, safe from his unnerved violence.

"It's no use, George — you hate me," she said. "We can't go on like this."

"We won't go on like this, either." Under her pitiless calm, his wrath had collapsed. He faced her now in a spent weakness, broken and sick and young. "We won't go on this way," he repeated in a fretful dulled menace. "Unless you're mighty careful, I'll wring your little neck some day and be done with the whole rotten business."

He straightened up, laboriously squared his shoulders, like a man with a racking pain at the small of his back, and blundered out of the room.

CAMP HAKOAH

We have learned with great satisfaction of the establishment in the Laurentian Mountains of a Jewish Summer Camp for boys and girls. Camps have developed to be an institution in American life, and, whilst Canadian parents have participated in the relief and satisfaction of sending their children to American summer camps, we feel that they should hail with joy the establishment of a modern and fully equipped camp in our own Laurentian Mountains at Trout Lake, Que.

Of particular interest is the establishment of this Camp to the Jewish community of this city, since we are most familiar with the organizers of the Camp, its administration, its location and its natural beauties.

The Camp will be under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Sourkes, both of whom have, for many years, won for themselves the admiration and the respect of all who have had the good fortune of coming into contact with them both in communal and social life. Mr. and Mrs. Sourkes have evidenced their personalities in every endeavor of Jewish interest in our community and are therefore particularly qualified to administrate an Institution which is to supervise the physical and cultural development of the children placed in their charge during the summer period.

The Camp is ideally situated on the borders of Trout Lake, and is easily accessible both by motor and by rail.

The Camp will be under the supervision of able and trained counsellors, and, whilst the Camp itself is in its embryonic stage, it devolves upon Jewish parents to encourage the rapid growth and development of this Institution so that they can benefit therefrom in the very near future. We cannot urge too strongly Montreal Jewish parents to take advantage of the many fine qualities that this particular Institution is endowed with, and we congratulate both Mr. and Mrs. Sourkes for the courage and the foresight they are showing as pioneers in an Institution which is destined to play an important and integral part in Canadian Jewish life.
